What is Wholesale Voice?

Businesses in the telecommunications industry use wholesale voice to provide international, long distance, toll free, DID, along with local voice services, as well as additional applications like dial-up, fax, and video conferencing. Often known as wholesale VOIP, wholesale voice is available in a variety of speeds, ranging from ISDN PRI T1 to OCx. Wholesale VoIP is regarded as a vital component of the international communications industry.

Why choose Wholesale Voice?

Supporting a blend of physical and increasingly virtualized infrastructure, as well as the administration of a variety of processes, are all part of delivering wholesale services. Wholesale carriers have expanded their services to include managed data centres, global internet connections, and co-location space. Support for cloud, software defined networking, and network function virtualization enhances the potential even more.

Wholesale carrier services would continue to evolve from standard IP transport to new service enablement, which would include the idea of cPaaS. (communications platform as a service). Similarly, these carriers have installed end-to-end core IP networks around the world and are leveraging new technologies and platforms to design and provide services that are far more cost-effective and efficient.

The growth of the telecom business in the region is predicted to boost broadband and mobile service penetration rates across the board, affecting all aspects of society. This tendency will be a primary driver of the region's wholesale voice carrier business in the coming years.
